Government expert discusses cotton and cows-All authorities agree that cotton can only successfully be grown with assistance of cows. A letter to the editor of the Reclamation Record for March by C. S. Scofield, agriculturist in charge of western irrigation agriculture of the department of agriculture, will be of special interest to the farmers of this val> ley. The letter is as follows: "Editor, Reclamation Record: I would like to offer, through your columns, some observations for the consideration of your readers on the Salt river and Yuma projects. On these two projects the production of cotton has come to be the largest crop industry. On the Salt river, cotton occupied fully 25 per cent of the cropped acreage last year, while on the Yuma something like 40 per cent of the land was used for this crop. At the prices ruling during the market season now closing, the cotton crop has been profitable, and the present indications point to an increased cotton acreage for the com-

> "This, of course, is a gratifying situation to those who have advocated cotton, particularly long staple cotton, as a crop for these projects. But there are some features of this situation that are rather disturbing when one looks a little ahead. As one of those who was identified with the early work of establishing the cotton industry on these projects, I feel that it may not be improper to call attention to the relaion of this to other local agricultural industries.

> "In the Salt River Valley, particularly, the live stock industries of dairying and beef production have long been of the first importance. These industries, based on the alfalfa crop, have been the backbone of the financial stability of the valley, and the accumulated fertility from years of live stock farming has contributed largely to the bountiful crops of cotton which have been produced in the past few years.

> "There are, of course, some of the new lands in both the Salt River and Yuma valleys on which most excellent crops of cotton can be produced for several years. But on much of the land in both valleys cotton must follow alfalfa if large yields are to be secured. And it is altogether advisable for the Arizona cotton grower to plan a system of farming which will make large yields possible, for price levels in the future may be such that only through large yields can profitable

> "The most immediate cause for apprehension is not, however, due to an anticipated decline in yield. It is due rather to a fear that enthusiasm for the possible profits of cotton production may jeopardize the future of the live stock industries that have been and should continue to be the basic industries of these valleys. It was not so many months ago, less than two years, in fact, that there were some 55,000 head of dairy cattle in the Salt River valley, with probably nearly half that number of beef cattle fed or fattened annually. These animals utilized most of the alfalfa produced on 150,000 acres of land, and both directly and indirectly contributed an enormous aggregate to the prosperity of the val-
